

Journalism

Contributed by Administrator
Sunday, 01 March 2009
Last Updated Monday, 02 March 2009

Studying journalism for many years are extremely popular. Journalism mainly associated with the english language and continued writing. Was correct, but you can not forget about the fact that students also learn from the sociology, culture studies, English philology and political science, so if you like to write, story was not bored and is interested in cultural issues, the study will not be a wasted time for you.

Journalism can be studied both at the state universities, as well as in private. The subjects in universities is quite similar, just as the form of preliminary examinations. There is a database of basic subjects, and exercises to perform material including the scope linguistics, communication theory, sociology, culture, politics, public relations, advertising and learning foreign languages. There are no studies extremely difficult, requiring absorbing materials on the memory. Learning focuses on reading books, preparing press notes, writing, etc. bane of most students is the logic and the right of the media. Universities also arrange congresses to which they invite professional journalists, known to the world media.

To get to the journalism at the university you need a big knowledge about the world of culture, media and politics. Candidate for the journalist to read a lot (obligatory press - both newspapers and the weekly political / social), attuned to the political and economic situation of the country (for example, to know who is the Minister of Economy, who was it ever), the representatives know the culture, the editors-in-chief major newspapers, the names of publications, interest in foreign policy, etc. It is said that the teachings of the exam must begin much earlier than in the fourth grade - embracing the whole of knowledge in the last minute is rather impossible.

The situation on the labor market is what is so freshly baked journalism graduate without work experience, can not count on the enthusiastic welcome from potential employers. Students should seek as soon as possible to practice, and any other forms of gaining experience. Fortunately, the market publications, magazines and newspapers everyday needs of many young people to help and not far from here. Tea. I really wish to be sufficient to semester after I start editing the daily practice that your family reads before going to work. As you know, it depends on student initiative.